MORE READINGS

Pathé Tuschinski is a movie theater in the Netherlands in Amsterdam commissioned by Abraham Icek Tuschinski in 1921 at a cost of 4 million guilders. The interior and exterior are a spectacular mix of styles, as designed by Hijman Louis de Jong; Amsterdam School, Jugendstil, Art Nouveau and Art Deco. The main auditorium hosts many premieres of Dutch films. It is considered to be one of the most beautiful cinemas in the world.

The building contains Asian influences while the lobby was designed in a way to offer theatergoers the feeling that they are stepping into an illusion. The Tuschinski's main auditorium has served as both a movie theater and a live performance space since its opening. In addition to a film screen, it also contains a stage and an organ.

Scheepvaarthuis (The Shipping House) is a building on the western tip of the Waalseiland near Amsterdam harbour that is one of the top 100 Dutch heritage sites and generally regarded as the first true example of the Amsterdam School, a style characterised by "expressive dynamism, lavish ornamentation and colourful embellishments". It is situated on the Prins Hendrikkade and was erected on the spot where Cornelis Houtman's first trip to the East Indies had begun in 1595. Built between 1912 and 1916 (during World War I), it was originally the headquarters of six leading Amsterdam shipping companies.

Gemeentemuseum Den Haag

Mondrian's unique collection of paintings is one of the highlights of the Gemeentemuseum in The Hague. His final, and perhaps most popular work is here: Victory Boogie Woogie. Mondrian was associated with the influential De Stijl Group, and the Gemeentemuseum Den Haag has a permanent exhibition on this important Dutch contribution to modern art.

World's largest Mondrian collection

Mondrian and De Stijl finally have a permanent home base in the Netherlands. Besides Rembrandt and Van Gogh, the work of De Stijl is the only art form to be included in the Canon of Dutch History. Without De Stijl, the homes and streets and the very cityscapes of the western world would have looked very different. Moreover, the group that grew up around Piet Mondrian and Theo van Doesburg continues to inspire artists, designers and architects even to this day. It is difficult to overestimate the significance of De Stijl, a movement that played a pivotal role in the European Avant-Garde. Gemeentemuseum Den Haag is dedicating an entire wing to Mondrian and De Stijl.

De Stijl

The essence of De Stijl was finding a new art form that could be functionally applied within society. The starting point was the search for an ideal society and a visual language to go with it. The rationale of De Stijl was typically Dutch. By working together, the artists and architects hoped to create Total Art. As the 20th century progressed, art historians began to describe De Stijl more and more as a discursive, structured, almost severe school of art. This was quite different to the intentions of the artists themselves. They used bright, primary colours to create works of art that were vivacious, bright and unrestrained, like the future itself.

It is this positive approach in particular that the Gemeentemuseum in The Hague has chosen to focus on in their renewed presentation of De Stijl. Gemeentemuseum Den Haag is home to the world's widest collection of works from De Stijl. The Gemeentemuseum's permanent Mondrian & De Stijl exhibition features work by Theo van Doesburg, Vilmos Huszár, Bart van der Leek, J.J.P. Oud, Gerrit Rietveld and Georges Vantongerloo, who, together with Mondrian, were the most important representatives of De Stijl.
